Day 30- It's Not Over Until You Land Your Successfully Ever After

Your job hunt isn't over once you submit your resume. Make sure you follow up with a phone call or email within a week. Reaching out to your would be interviewer shows you're serious and interested. It gives you another chance to move to the top of their mind.

Here's a sample follow-up email you can use.

Hi (insert their name),
My name is (Your Name) and I recently applied online for (Position) with (Company) (if you submitted through a job site, make sure you reference which one for reference). I have attached my resume and cover letter here for your review.

I believe I'm an excellent candidate for the (position) because (explain in short form why you match the job), and I would like the opportunity to discuss the position with you further.

Final Thoughts

It's not unusual to get discouraged while you are in the search process. That's normal. Don't let it derail your mission. We attach a lot of our value and self-esteem on our jobs. So when you're not working, it's easy to feel like you are "less than." Take a deep breath and remember your worth isn't wrapped in a job title. Most job searches take 6 months. However, by implementing these Successfully Ever After tips, I hope to cut that time down substantially for you.

I encourage you to find a close friend or spouse to talk with throughout this process. It's easy to lose the big picture if you stay within yourself. Treat your job search like a job. Spend an hour a day tweaking your online presence, polishing your cover letter and searching for positions to apply for. Do something fun and find moments of joy throughout the process. You can't stay in front of the computer 24/7. Get out and go for a walk. The body and mind need to move.

If you work this process and devote time daily, I feel confident you'll land in your Successfully Ever After.
